Brand Visual Motif

The Art of Puzzle

HuntHire can leverage the concept of art puzzle for its brand visual motif. A jigsaw puzzle perfectly embodies its service of connecting right talents with right companies. The logo can be a stylized puzzle piece, like a whole piece where the negative space forms a person and a building, or two interlocking pieces. A professional color palette with a pop of color, puzzle imagery showcasing diverse talent and companies as puzzle boards, and clean typography will solidify the motif. This memorable and meaningful concept can be incorporated throughout branding materials, from website design to marketing materials, for a strong brand identity.

Text Color

Text color goes beyond aesthetics; it acts like a visual language. It can highlight crucial information, categorize content, and even influence mood. Imagine a website where warnings blaze in red, while calming blue quotes provide a breather. This strategic use of color not only guides readers but also subtly shapes their emotional response to the content.

Secondary Color

Secondary colors, created by mixing primary colors, serve a vital role in expanding our visual palette. They bridge the gap between the core colors, offering a wider range of options for creating depth, vibrancy, and contrast. Imagine a painting restricted to just primaries; it would lack the richness and complexity achieved by incorporating thoughtfully chosen secondary hues. These in-between colors allow artists and designers to build more nuanced and visually compelling compositions.

Tertiary Color

Our tertiary colors are used on our social media, in presentations, website and in supergraphic. The purpose is to keep the content dynamic and also can help differentiate between demographics, highlight key information and add another level of energy to the Hunthire brand.

These colors should be used sparingly, never as main floods of backgrounds or typography. They are meant to help empower our primary set of colors.

Color implementation / Do-nots

The purpose of logo colors in branding is to evoke certain emotions, create brand recognition, and communicate the brand's personality and values.

When selecting logo colors for branding, it is important to conduct thorough research, understand the target audience, and align the colors with the brand's overall strategy and values.

General Sans is a rationalist sans serif typeface. Its letterforms feel like the France of the 1950s; they are very orderly, but also a bit spritely. The letters' apertures are very small, making the counter-forms in typeface feel like they are being completely enclosed within their surrounding characters. The General Sans family comes in twelve weights ranging from Extralight to Bold with complementary italics .

Cabinet Grotesk is a family of contemporary fonts. In terms of design, Cabinet Grotesk is a sans; however, its letters feature of kind of stroke-contrast that set them apart from other sans serifs. The family includes eight styles, which range in weight from Thin through Extrabold – even the Thin weight maintains the family's stroke-contrast model.
